A: There is a lot of information available over the internet. I'll direct you to this page which appears to have an easy to understand OBD II Tutorial. A hyper-graphical model of a compound muscle action potential. A hyper-graphical modeling methodology for the generation of an integral action potential (IAP) is presented. The voltage profile of the action potential is described by a parametric function, which is constructed from hyper-graphs linking the input, output, and hidden nodes of the model. Hyper-graphical modeling consists of a combination of graphs that organize information along several levels of hierarchy. The methodology is illustrated with the simulation of an experimentally recorded compound muscle action potential (CMAP) from a motor nerve root of a cat. This illustrative example demonstrates the utility of our method for the description of the CMAP in terms of relationships between input-output segments rather than in terms of a single data point as, for example, is commonly done in the analysis of electrophysiological signals. Results obtained with hyper-graphical modeling are compared with the IAP measured in the same experiment. For both the hyper-graphical model and the model obtained by the method of data interpolation, the input-output relationship of the CMAP is accurately reproduced. The hyper-graphical model, which predicts all segments of the CMAP, correctly describes the latency and duration of the IAP. It provides the opportunity of following the evolution of the action potential as parameters of the model are varied, thus allowing the insight into the effect of pharmacological agents.

Q: How to get ID of the image being clicked on by javascript? I have in place a listener to a onclick event and it works well on most sites I visit. However, on this one site I am using, it is throwing errors when I try to click on the image. The errors say that the clicked element is null. I'm not sure why the clicked element is null, as I thought that this element would be the image itself. Here's a link to the page: Here is the code I am using in the onclick event listener:
